A Deadly Broncho.

Two men with wide-brimmed hats and weather-bronzed countenances sat in the Sturtevant house with a reporter for the Mail and Ex rest, smoking and talking. They were cattlemen and owned ranches in New Mexico and Colorado. They were talking of ranchreer and sudden end of some of their cowboys. The ranchman from Colorada, who had once visited the New Mexican, asked him if Greaser Pedro, the Mexican cowboy, who could ride any animal be could straidle, was still at his ranch.

"No," was the answer. "He is dead. I will tell you about it. One day, at a round-up, Greaser Petro was bragging of his ability to ride any creature on legs. He dashed about among the cowboys, throwing his larint and cutting all sorts of dales on his horse's Finally one of the cowboys said: 'Say, Greesy,'-they always call him Greasy,—i'd bet my lariat agin yourn and a pint of whisky thrown in yer can't rite that piebald broncho Gizzard Jim fetched here yesterday.' The bet was accepted by Pedro. The brongin was based and after several attempts a saddle was suckled on him. All the cowboys mounted their horses to follow up the broncho if he ran and see the fun. The little animal looked sleepy-eyed and tucked its tail between its legs and trotted around stiff-jointed. With one bound Pedro leaped into the saddle and cried, 'let go?' The cow-boys give a wild Comanche whoop and away dashed the sleepy-eyed broncho. He can a quarter of a mile in a doggallop, the poys all keeping along and trying to friguten him. Took be changet his tacties, and began to run around in a circle and buck. The greaser stuck to him live a leech, but the violent bucking shook the color out of his face. The broncho had not taken his tail from between his legs, and this gave the cowboys hope that he would yet throw the Mexican. Another run of twice the first distance and then a wild bucking spree, but the rider seemed glued on the animal's back. Over half an hour had passed in this wild and exciting pastime, and it looked very much like the greaser would win the bet. The broneno all at once seemed to gather new vitality and new strategy. He laid down and rolled over, but as soon as he regained his feet Pedro was in the saddle. A wiid bucking dash forward and a sudden elaborate rings. halt; then rearing up quickly the pie-bald animal fell backward, full on the body of Pedro, who did not have time to jump oil and save his life. He rolled over the Mexican and then got up and tyrned an I looked at the figure on the ground as if he expected it to rise and jamp on his back again. But he didn't rise, and lay there stone dead, his head along-ide of a cactus plant.

" I've won,' said the cowboy. " You will have to divide with me," replied Gizz and Jam.

Bliss was cool as ice. He fell over a chair, upset a young woman, and rushed into the kitchen and got a tea cup of water and doused on the flames This didn't do any good, and he kicked over a eucher-stand and pounded at the flames with a rug. Then he rushed after more water, and this time it was the contents of the dipper which he emptied over the champion progressive encherist instead of the blazing curtain. It was not until the smoking remnants had been dragged down and flung out doors that Bliss thought of his grenades, and it wasn't two min-utes after he had got hold of one ba-fore he had knocked down two men, smashed the parlor mirror and cleared the house of the crowd. I was going up in one of the Yonge street cars the other evening. The car was well filled on both sides-chiefly by ladies-and, being very narrow, it was next to impossible for one to move in or out by reason of the interlocked feet of the passengers. A lady got on the platform and sought a seat, but there was none for her. A young man at the front of the car rose and offered his, but the new spassenger couldn't make her way to it. The other lades looked back at her very indifferently, and, while it would be the easiest thing in the world to "move up a peg," none of them budged. "You may as well take your seat, sir." I heard some one say to the young man; "ladies never make room for each other.—Toronto (Ontario) Globe,
